Childhood Trauma

Early childhood trauma generally refers to the traumatic experiences that occur to children aged zero to six. Because infants' and young children's reactions may be different from older children's and because they may not be able to verbalize their reactions to threatening or dangerous events, many people assume that young age protects children from the impact of traumatic experiences.

A growing body of research has established that young children are affected by events that threaten their safety or the safety of their parents or caregivers, and their symptoms have been well documented.

These traumas can be the result of intentional behaviors – such as child physical or sexual abuse, or domestic violence – or the result of natural disaster, accidents, or war.

Young children also may experience traumatic stress in response to painful medical procedures or the sudden loss of a parent or caregiver.

Early life traumas can actually alter young children's brains and result in developmental and behavioral problems.

Without a close, loving relationship with parents and other caregivers, children learn they cannot rely on anyone to help them. When they are exploited and abused, children believe that they are bad and the world is unsafe and terrible.

Trauma impairs the normal development of the brain and nervous system, the immune system, and the body's response systems.

Unaddressed, trauma can have long term effects on the quality and length of a person's life.
